Background

Finding Australian content to support Australian healthcare workers and researchers can be difficult. While key databases such as PubMed, Cochrane Library etc can be searched and results restricted in various ways to identify Australian studies, there remains a large literature which can only be found using more focused databases and sources. For example, the Australasian Medical Index (Refer AustHEALTH below) indexes a large number of publications not indexed in PubMed. This handout has been developed to provide useful websites which can be searched for such information.

The following sites have been nominated, mostly by health librarians, as potentially useful for one of the following reasons:

- They are an Australian organisation/service with a primary and explicit interest in evidence based practice, OR
- They are a database which indexes Australian health literature.

This list is not exhaustive. Professional bodies, associated bodies and library sites, many of which provide excellent links to evidence based resources, have generally been excluded to make the list manageable. Most, but not all, sites are free to access. If access usually incurs charges, the annotation of $$$ is used. Inquiries about such resources should be directed to your local institutional library, which may provide you with access through a paid subscription.

The sites in this list have not been evaluated for their quality or accuracy in any way. This remains your responsibility. This edition replaces the version first produced in July 2006.
